Preface

In times of crisis, those living in precarious circumstances suffer most. Conflicts, disasters and a global pandemic continue to pose extraordinary challenges for individuals and societies across the globe, with far-reaching health, economic, educational, social and personal costs.

Governments have the power to change this trajectory.

In Australia, extended lockdowns and border closures during COVID-19 meant that for the first time, many people had an insight into some of the deprivations that are hallmarks of displacement – the inability to cross borders lawfully, loss of liberty, confinement, separation from family and friends, and extreme uncertainty. But whereas for them, these measures were temporary, for many refugees and other displaced people, such limbo is permanent.

With Australia's borders reopened, we now have a particular opportunity – indeed, responsibility – to rethink and reset Australia's asylum policies, drawing on this newfound understanding. This includes reinvigorating Australia's successful resettlement program; increasing other protection pathways for refugees stuck overseas; abolishing mandatory, and potentially indefinite, detention; and providing recognised refugees with permanent protection.

At this critical juncture, we are reissuing an updated version of the Kaldor Centre Principles for Australian Refugee Policy, which provide a stable foundation for policymaking in this area. They are grounded in evidence-based research and are informed by good practices from other countries, as well as from Australia's past. They provide concrete examples of how, and why, Australia can develop a more humane, sustainable and manageable approach to protection that simultaneously benefits refugees, asylum seekers and the Australian community as a whole.

Introduction

Australia has had a proud record of welcoming refugees since 1945, giving people a new home, new hope and new opportunities. Our reward has been a strong economy, an authoritative voice in world affairs, and vibrant, globally connected communities. In recent years, however, our refugee policy has changed direction; it no longer provides a sustainable, humane response that enables both refugees and Australia to prosper. This is out of step with our shared values as a 'fair go' nation that does the right thing by people in need.

A successful refugee policy not only manages national borders, but also protects people who need safety and demonstrates leadership in meeting the global challenge of displacement. The Kaldor Centre Principles for Australian Refugee Policy, distilled below, set out an independent, non-partisan framework for achieving a principled and pragmatic policy.

Supported by law, evidence-based research, good practices from other countries, and Australia's own history, the Principles provide a stable foundation for responsible policymaking, and make specific recommendations for meaningful, measurable actions towards a better future.

Australia should comply with its international legal obligations

Australia played a key role in drafting the international treaties that protect people fleeing persecution and other forms of serious harm. These agreements reinforce, rather than undermine, Australia's sovereignty, providing the framework within which governments can manage their borders yet still cooperate on matters of common concern. Revitalising our commitments in practice will deliver Australia renewed authority as a leader in human rights and provide a stronger foundation for real and effective international cooperation on refugee issues, which cannot be resolved unilaterally.

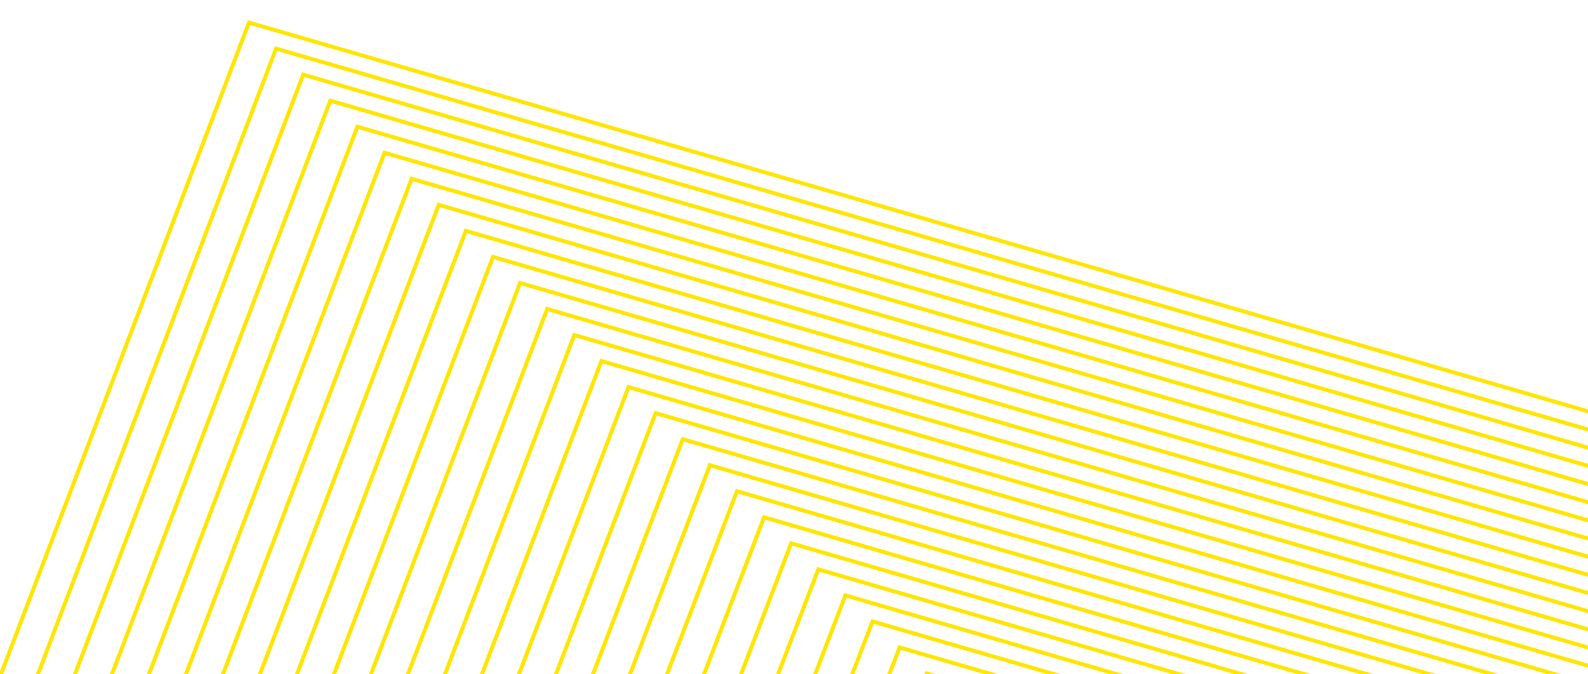

Australia must not send people to any country where they face a real chance of being persecuted or subjected to other serious harm. This fundamental obligation (known as the principle of non-refoulement) is enshrined in the refugee and human rights treaties accepted by Australia. It reflects the universal, and Australian, value of decency.

Australia's obligations under international law apply wherever it acts, including where it intercepts boats carrying asylum seekers at sea or exercises control over refugees held offshore. Australia cannot 'contract out' of its obligations by sending people to other countries.

To be effective, Australia's international legal obligations should be incorporated into domestic law, and accountability mechanisms should be put in place to ensure compliance.

Specific steps that Australia should take include:

- › Repealing section 197C of the Migration Act 1958 (Cth), which says that Australia's non-refoulement obligations are irrelevant to the removal of unlawful non-citizens, as well as related provision section 197D
- › Repealing the self-contained statutory framework in the Migration Act which sets out Australia's own interpretation of its protection obligations under the Refugee Convention (which was introduced by the Migration and Maritime Powers Legislation Amendment (Resolving the Asylum Legacy Caseload) Act 2014 (Cth))
- › Re-inserting references to the Refugee Convention in the Migration Act (which were removed by the Migration and Maritime Powers Legislation Amendment (Resolving the Asylum Legacy Caseload) Act)
- › Removing the legislative bar that prevents certain asylum seekers from applying for a visa in Australia
- › Repealing the offshore processing regime in Division 8, Subdivision B of the Migration Act, which is incompatible with Australia's obligations under international law
- › Inserting a statelessness status determination procedure into the Migration Act

Australia should provide humane, fair reception conditions

a) End mandatory and indefinite detention

Australia is one of the few countries with a policy of mandatory, and potentially indefinite, detention. On average, people seeking Australia's protection are detained for nearly 700 days, and some have been detained for over 10 years. This is significantly out-of-step with practice elsewhere. In Europe, for instance, the average length of detention is less than 90 days, and in some countries it is even shorter. Tried and tested alternatives to detention exist, such as open reception centres, travel restrictions and reporting requirements, and are much more cost-effective.

By definition, mandatory detention is arbitrary and thus contrary to international law. Experience shows that detaining asylum seekers and refugees can have devastating effects on their mental health and hamper their ability to rebuild their lives once released. People seeking asylum should only be detained where absolutely necessary for a brief initial period for registration, documentation, health and security checks. On rare occasions when detention is required beyond this, including in cases that raise security issues, it should be justified by individual circumstances, proportionate to the reasons for detention, reviewable by a court, and subject to time limits specified by law. Children should never be detained on account of their immigration status.

Where detention is deemed necessary, it should only ever be in an appropriate facility with the minimum necessary level of security and with adequate access to open air, recreational and leisure activities, education programs, visitors and excursions.

b) Process asylum claims in Australia, not offshore

Australia's offshore processing arrangements are unsustainable; they exact an extraordinarily high human, financial and reputational cost and in many cases fail to provide durable solutions for those transferred. The United Nations has described Australia's offshore processing regime as 'an affront to the protection of human rights'.

Australia should end offshore processing and fulfil its international legal obligations to all people sent offshore. Those found to be refugees should be settled promptly in Australia or in another country able and willing to provide effective protection and a durable solution in accordance with international law. Those found not to require protection should be given appropriate assistance to enable them to rebuild their lives elsewhere. Solutions must include the people who remain in Papua New Guinea despite the withdrawal of Australian officers and contractors at the end of 2021.

The abolition of offshore processing would bring Australia into line with international good practice and human rights law. It would save Australia billions of dollars that could be spent pursuing more effective and humane refugee policies. It would also pave the way for more genuine and equitable cooperation on refugee protection between Australia and other countries in the Asia-Pacific region.

c) Enable dignified living conditions for all people seeking asylum

Many people seeking asylum in Australia live in destitution, without secure work, adequate health care, basic financial assistance, counselling or other support. Australia should allow all those seeking asylum the opportunity to work so that they can contribute to their own well-being and to the Australian community. Australia should provide adequate support and a social security safety net to those unable to find employment. At a minimum, Australia should ensure that people seeking asylum have access to basic health care, housing support, financial assistance, counselling, language training and other essential services.

Specific steps that Australia should take include:

- › Abolishing mandatory detention in section 189 of the Migration Act and replacing it with an individual assessment consistent with due process and international human rights law
- › Enabling an individual to have a decision to detain them judicially reviewed, on a periodic basis
- › Amending section 4AA of the Migration Act to provide that children must never be detained
- › Abolishing offshore processing, including by repealing sections 198AA–AJ of the Migration Act and associated regulations
- › Finding durable solutions for those subject to offshore processing, whether they are in Australia on a temporary basis or still offshore
- › Ensuring access to work rights, basic health care and income support for all people seeking asylum, regardless of how or when they arrived

Australia should provide a fair, efficient and transparent system for processing asylum claims

Ensuring fair, efficient and transparent asylum procedures benefits the Australian community and people seeking asylum. Without proper procedures in place, Australia cannot accurately identify the people to whom it owes protection. Expeditious, effective decision-making promotes certainty for applicants and allows those whose claims are accepted to rebuild their lives and become full participants in Australian society. It contributes to the timely return of those not entitled to international protection, and it promotes public confidence in the system.

People seeking Australia's protection, regardless of how or when they arrived, should have access to asylum procedures that accord with international standards. They should have the opportunity to present their claim fully and to have it assessed by a suitably qualified, impartial and accountable decision-maker. Asylum claims must be processed in a fair, efficient and transparent manner. The 'fast track' procedures and airport entry screening procedures currently used for some applicants do not meet these (or other) minimum standards. They do not provide procedural safeguards, and they discriminate against certain refugees.

Appropriate support for people seeking asylum enables them to present their claims effectively, decreasing the likelihood of appeals and increasing efficiency. People seeking asylum in Australia should be provided with age, gender and diversity-sensitive counselling, government-funded legal advice and representation based on need, and tailored assistance for those with special requirements. Those whose claims for protection are unsuccessful should have prompt access to review by an independent tribunal and the courts. Where security issues arise, they should be dealt with in accordance with Australia's international legal obligations, due process and the rule of law.

Specific steps that Australia should take include:

- › Repealing the 'fast track' assessment process and abolishing the Immigration Assessment Authority
- › Establishing asylum screening procedures at airports through legislation which prioritise assessing asylum claims over visa cancellation
- › Re-instating access to free legal assistance for people seeking asylum
- › Ensuring that country information relied upon by decision-makers is reviewed regularly for accuracy and currency
- › Ensuring that all asylum seekers have access to full merits review of asylum decisions
- › Creating a formal, independent and merits-based appointment procedure for members of the Administrative Appeals Tribunal

Australia should respect the principles of family unity and the best interests of the child

Respect for family unity and the best interests of the child are fundamental principles of international human rights law and central to core Australian values. Yet, Australia's current asylum policies result in the separation of many families, potentially indefinitely.

Australia must ensure that its policies do not cause family separation, and that separated families are reunited. In particular, children should not be separated from their parents, and their health, welfare and education should be carefully safeguarded. The best interests of the child must be a primary consideration in all decisions affecting them.

Australia should not send asylum-seeker children and their families offshore. Families should be kept together in Australia and provided with the necessary support to enable their well-being while their claims are assessed, including help to integrate and succeed. Children who arrive in Australia without a parent or guardian should be given special assistance, including through the appointment of an independent guardian with the power to advocate for their best interests.

Australia's well-established family reunification program should be expanded, with a quota separate from the general refugee resettlement intake. Restrictions on applications for family reunification should be removed to give all those entitled to Australia's protection the opportunity to be reunited with their families.

Specific steps that Australia should take include:

- › Restoring family reunion rights for all refugees, regardless of their mode of arrival
- › Repealing section 91WB of the Migration Act, which denies protection to a refugee's family members if they apply after the refugee has already been granted a protection visa
- › Expanding the family reunification program beyond the general refugee resettlement intake
- › Appointing an independent guardian for children who arrive without a parent or guardian to avoid any conflict of interest for the Minister, who is currently appointed as the guardian
- › Ensuring that children who raise protection claims at airports do not have their visas cancelled before the protection claim has been assessed by a qualified, impartial and accountable decision-maker

Australia should create additional safe, lawful pathways to protection

People fleeing persecution, conflict and human rights abuses often face unimaginable dangers on their journeys to find safety and protection. Many refugees who make dangerous boat journeys or resort to the assistance of smugglers understand the risks, but with no alternative pathway to safety, they may have no other option.

Most people want to move safely and lawfully. Most governments want to know who has entered their territory and why. Creating safe, lawful pathways to protection – opportunities for refugees to seek safety without putting their lives at risk – is therefore in everyone's interests.

Australia should increase its resettlement quota to better reflect the scale of global displacement and the needs identified by UNHCR. Its resettlement program should prioritise people with the greatest protection needs and maintain sufficient flexibility to respond to changing priorities, including a dedicated quota for urgent or emergency cases. Restrictions on resettlement based on someone's date, mode or place of arrival should be removed.

In addition, Australia should provide other safe, lawful pathways to protection. This includes special humanitarian intakes for people fleeing particular crises; expanded programs for people particularly at risk or otherwise in danger of being left behind (including women and girls at risk); greater access to skilled or student visas for refugees; and expanded community and private sponsorship of refugees.

Specific steps that Australia should take include:

- › Increasing the resettlement quota and reviewing it annually, with an eye to needs identified by UNHCR, especially given the dramatic reduction in resettlement places between 2019 and 2021 on account of COVID-19
- › Removing resettlement restrictions on refugees in Indonesia
- › Enhancing community and private sponsorship of refugees, additional to the number of government resettlement places
- › Setting aside a quota for special humanitarian intakes, through which Australia can offer a timely response to emerging refugee crises (eg Afghanistan, Ukraine)
- › Expanding options for 'in-country processing' by giving people at risk the opportunity to apply for protection before they flee their home countries (for example, by expanding the In-country Special Humanitarian Visa (subclass 201))
- › Facilitating refugees' access to visas for skilled migration, study, family reunion and so on by relaxing certain documentary requirements and waiving or reducing fees

Australia should provide global and regional leadership on refugee protection

The challenges of refugee protection are global in nature and require international cooperation. In 2018, Australia committed to 'more equitable sharing of the burden and responsibility for hosting and supporting the world's refugees' through the Global Compact on Refugees. Australia can demonstrate its commitment to this goal by actively promoting protection and solutions for refugees, including through the expanded and strategic use of resettlement, humanitarian and development assistance, and diplomatic efforts within the Asia-Pacific region and globally.

To exercise effective leadership, Australia must show its own commitment to refugee protection by bringing its policies into line with its international obligations and the spirit of responsibility-sharing. It should also commit its on-going support to working with other governments and the United Nations, through both funding and action, to secure protection and durable solutions for refugees both within and beyond the region. This would enhance Australia's credibility on refugee issues in global and regional fora, laying a stronger foundation for future cooperative action.

It is in Australia's interests to promote refugee protection and regional cooperation in the Asia-Pacific, in particular. By working cooperatively with our neighbours and demonstrating leadership through good practices, Australia could more effectively address the root causes of displacement, enhance protection in countries of first asylum, encourage responsibility-sharing among States, and increase the availability of durable solutions for refugees in the region.

Every four years at the UN's Global Refugee Forum, Australia will be called upon to provide concrete pledges towards the objectives of the Global Compact on Refugees. By increasing its own financial and other contributions, addressing its own human rights record, and actively working with its partners and neighbours, Australia could again play a leading role in advancing refugee protection worldwide.

Specific steps that Australia should take include:

- › Increasing funding to UNHCR
- › Engaging in good faith to promote protection-sensitive cooperation mechanisms in the Asia-Pacific region
- › Increasing its aid program as a proportion of Australia's Gross National Income from its current level (of around 0.2 per cent) to 0.7 per cent, in line with commitments under the UN Sustainable Development Goals

Australia should invest in refugees for long-term success

Investing in refugees as members of our community, and enabling them to strengthen their education, skills and resilience, allows them to contribute to their own well-being as well as that of their families and their communities. Australia's history shows that welcoming refugees is not only possible, but also a source of great rewards for our nation. Providing the conditions for refugees to rebuild their lives in safety and dignity benefits everyone. A welcoming, secure and respectful environment for refugees results in greater economic and cultural richness for the community and a stronger, more socially cohesive Australia.

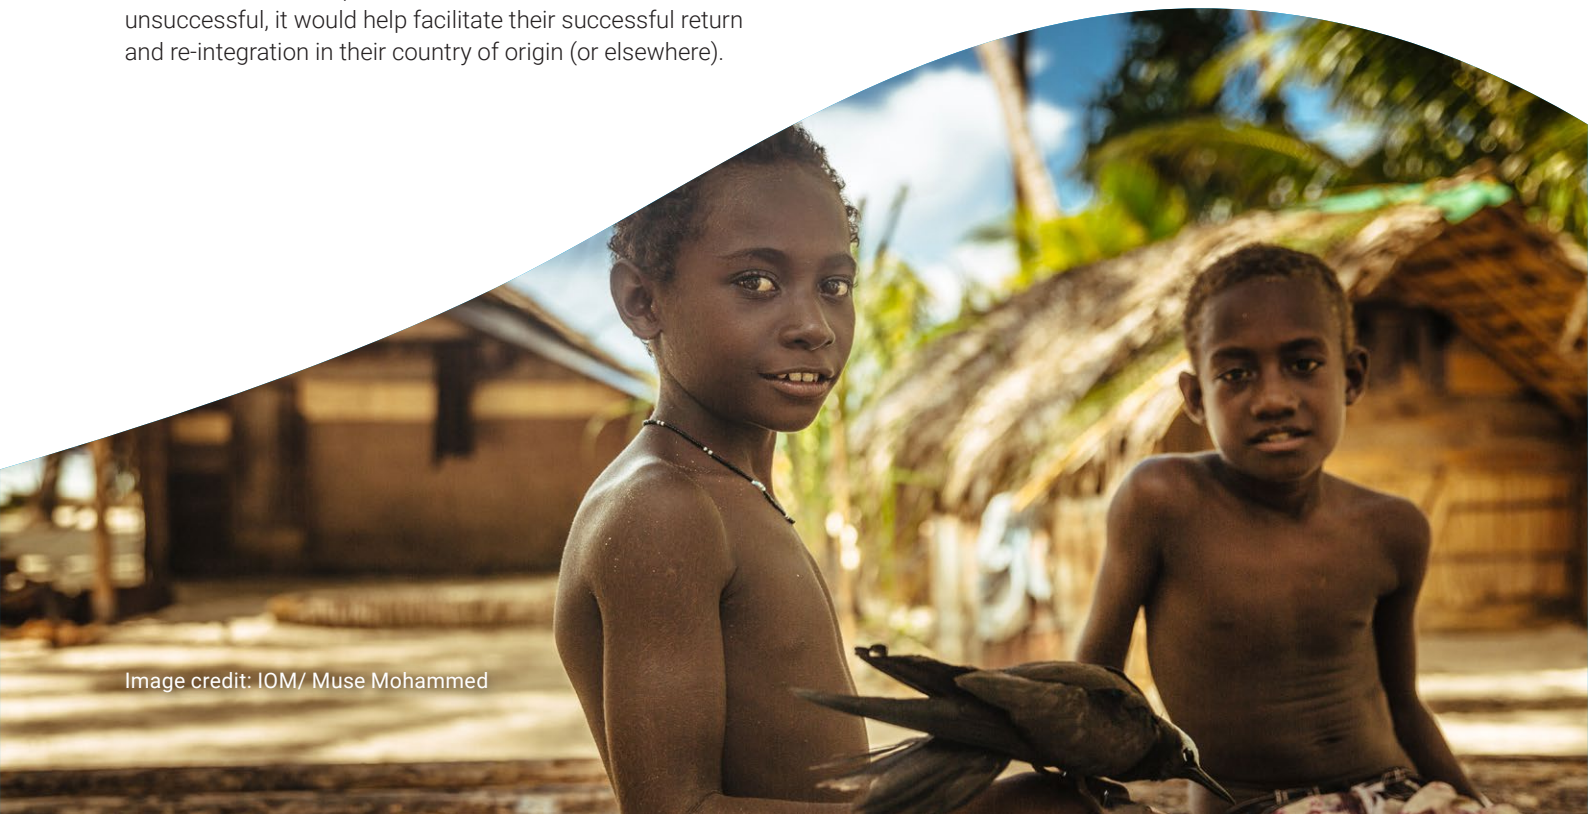

Time-limited protection visas are at odds with this. Australia should abolish temporary protection visas, which hinder refugees' ability to move forward with their lives because their status must be re-assessed every few years. Temporary protection visas also deny refugees the chance to become full members of the Australian community with the full responsibilities of citizenship.

Australia should invest in refugees' settlement, integration and inclusion, including by providing them with medical care, English language tuition, and such other social support as will enable them to live with dignity in the community. Access to work and study from the moment of arrival, and during the determination of protection claims, would promote long-term integration for those who are found to be refugees or otherwise in need of protection. For those whose claims are unsuccessful, it would help facilitate their successful return and re-integration in their country of origin (or elsewhere).

Specific steps that Australia should take include:

- › Increasing funding to settlement services
- › Abolishing temporary forms of protection (including Temporary Protection Visas, Safe Haven Enterprise Visas and Temporary (Humanitarian Concern) Visas) and instead providing refugees with permanent protection

In conclusion, Australia's refugee policies need to deal fairly with those who seek our protection. We need to look out for the family and to protect children and childhood. We need to offer new ways to a new life for more of the world's displaced people. And then, once again, we can provide leadership in the protection of refugees, while we also benefit from our investment in them.
